Benoît Fliche (Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, "Études turques et ottomanes", Paris)

The present two-day workshop is part of a project which aims at constituting a research group dealing with the 'forging of administration'. This rather sibylline phrase points to an endeavour to address the issue of faked and forged documents as a pathway for investigating administration backstage, in a variety of imperial, national or local situations. Our disciplinary span straddles historical, anthropological and sociological perspectives, along with legal or literary ones. We will also strive to maintain a diachronic approach, as a way to interweave aspects of past and present administration, in former empires as in the states which took over. While first inspired by an analysis focused on Ottoman and post-Ottoman case studies (in which both the workshop's organizers share a primary interest), the idea also is to bring about a comparative criss-crossing of variously situated studies.

A word about the project's broader backdrop is in order. Administration produces idiosyncratic ideologies and singular behaviors; it also enacts ad hoc logics of writing and reading. When relating to it, the 'administered' ones contrive particular sets of abilities and competences: i.e., they develop techniques of accommodation-, patronage- and favor-securing. Fakes and forgeries are part and parcel of this large body of administrative knowledge and know-how which one needs to tease out. (Think for instance of ID-trafficking, if not identity-trafficking, which sometimes comes up as a tactical expedient for circumventing administrative constraints in today's Turkey.) They are to form the privileged topic of inquiry during the Berlin meeting. Several dimensions may be explored and intertwined:

- the forged documents themselves, and their characteristics;
- their users and producers, be they from within or outside the administrative circles;
- the counter-measures developed by authorities for devising fakeproof items

The main working languages of the sessions will be English and French.

The participants include eight paper presenters and eight discussants. Papers having been circulated in advance, each paper presenter will be given 30 minutes to provide an overview of his/her research, followed by 45 minutes of discussion (first by two discussants, then by all the participants and audience) for each paper.
